Goals	Customers buy value propositions, not products, services or features. They buy from the company that trustworthily promises the most value. And they buy what is in their best interest. This realization has substantial consequences for the marketing strategy of companies. The focus is no longer on marketing a product or service, but rather on crafting an outstanding value proposition for a relevant and profitable market segment. Using several levers such as price or sales control management, firms can ensure that value created for customers pays off to the firm.
Description	This course elaborates on the steps of value-based marketing in business-to-consumer as well as business-to-business settings. The first half of the course is dedicated to introducing you to different strategies and tactics marketers can use to create value for (and with) customers. In particular, we will focus on two crucial value creation levers: employees (e.g., salespeople) and segmentation combined with solution selling. In the second part of the course we focus on how firms can ensure that they reap the (financial) benefits for their value creation efforts. In particular, we focus on pricing, which tends to be the least taught of marketing's 4Ps despite its tremendous implications for firms' bottom lines. In particular, we will examine the psychology of price as well as organizational issues in managing prices. Eventually, best value for customers yields best value for a firm's shareholders. In this course, you learn how to set up value-based marketing strategies to target customers across markets. You develop an analytical framework to assess value-based marketing and pricing strategies as well as expand your capabilities of assessing and designing these strategies in a real-life managerial context. Complementary, you develop a wide range of skills to analyse marketing practice in a real-life case competition.
