Goals Students who successfully complete this course will
 1.) understand theoretical issues in strategic management with emerging market applications.
 2.) apply theory to real world cases.
 3.) understand the strategic decisions of businesses in emerging markets.
 4.) analyze the business environment in emerging markets.
 5.) construct and deliver clear concise oral and written business communication.

Description This course is designed to teach students how to critically assess challenges and opportunities in emerging markets. The course will be structured in two parts. The first and longest section, key challenges, will use a combination of in-class case analyses and academic publications. We begin with investment opportunities in emerging markets as production locations, as markets, and as reservoirs of natural resources. We discuss features of economic, social, and political institutions that differ from those in more-advanced market economies, as well as the strategies firms develop to navigate and fill institutional voids. For example, we consider how firms develop political connections and social networks to secure protection of assets. On contributions of MNEs to globalization, we emphasize differences between MNEs that enter vs those that originate from emerging markets. We conclude this section by shedding light on the geography of technological innovation efforts there. With this background, the second section, country studies, is student-led with presentations of emerging country analyses. These countries have been categorized by infrastructure and institutions, giving attention to countries beyond BRICs.
